About Dr Trish Bachelor

Dr Trish Bachelor is Principal Medical Adviser at the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT) and was previously Consultant Medical Adviser to the Australian Federal Police. She has an extensive background in travel medicine, including working in expatriate clinics in Kathmandu and Ho Chi Minh City, and was founder of the Travel Doctor group of clinics in New Zealand. She teaches doctors and nurses undertaking the University of Otago Travel Medicine diploma, and is currently a Stage C trainee on the AFOEM program.

She will talk about expatriate health issues. An expatriate is defined as someone who is taking up residence in another country for occupational purposes, and returning to their country of origin when their assignment is over. Complexity is added when organisations are also responsible for the health of accompanying families. The talk will cover general preparation issues, expatriate health risks, air pollution, and mental health issues, including the stress involved with our changing world security situation.

About Dr Doug Randell

Dr Randell is the Group Medical Director for Aspen Medical, a global healthcare provider providing services to the government, defence, oil & gas, mining and resources, and humanitarian sectors in 13 nations. Dr Randell is a physician leader whose clinical background includes specialist qualifications in aviation medicine, military medicine and general practice and significant experience in corporate health, travel and tropical medicine, aeromedical retrieval and primary health care in remote and rural areas. Dr Randell has worked in Papua New Guinea, East Timor, Nepal, India, and the UAE. He is a qualified diving medicine examiner, rail medical examiner and aviation medical examiner.
